Hall: Physicist And Philosopher Wolfgang P. Hall: Physicist And Philosopher Recently I've been thinking about my own entrance into physics. I'm really not sure when I first became consciously aware that "physics" was my passion, not biology. A bit like the phrase "I want to be a Doctor", I'm pretty sure that I just suddenly said "physics", rather than "chemistry" or "math", but I was hoping I wouldn't be the only one who made a similar - and probably erroneous - assumption. Obviously, I never considered that I might actually be a physicist, but I think I was probably aware that, for me, "physics" meant a specific combination of understanding and "doing", and that I liked to do things. I've always been aware that my learning style is quite different from that of most people. I tend to learn best by reading, rather than listening to, and by doing, rather than reading about. In my academic and professional life this has been a really useful way of working, both academically (which I've always found far more enjoyable than theory) and in the engineering and design fields. But it's only quite recently that I've become aware of some of the underlying principles behind that. A course I've been taking for the past two years has been dedicated to describing this in more detail, so I'm going to take the opportunity to expand on it here. Many people assume that "doing" and "reading" are fairly orthogonal, and thus "doing" may be taken as just a slightly inconvenient method of "reading". This is how I've always learned: I'll do, say, a maze to solve, and then I
