A custom brush is either a selection of color or a path tool that you draw on an image. There are thousands of brushes you can choose from or create yourself. You can add a pattern, such as an abstract composition, to a brush, so you can create your own unique elements like Instagram filters; and you can edit what happens when you brush across a portion of the image that's in color, pattern, or both. Brushes can also overlap, overlap blocks of colors and patterns, or even be drawn using a photo, as well as blend one brush into another. Go to the Brush panel, scroll to the top, and click Create New Brush. Enter a name for your new brush, and then click OK. A palette appears, showing what's available. You can click on any photo or pattern or other brush created by the app to access brushes that look like the ones in the image. I think the most significant feature in Photoshop is the great Cloud engine, which helps speed up many commonly performed tasks in the software. For instance, if you use the Liquify tool on an image and then want to apply the "Pinch to Smarten" feature to the image, you can have the tool find the correct layer, and have the automation manipulate the layer using the "Pinch to Smarten" features. This frees you from performing the steps manually. I think this Cloud power is even more beneficial in the "Painter Brush Mode" tool, where it helpfully finds the correct layer for where you paint. I have to admit Photoshop has received remarkably little speedup during the last few years. I presume this is the result of leaving particular features behind until they are upgraded and not cutting back on resources. The argument that features are better than faster is a weak one. Using less resources is important, not better quality, in this case. Performance enhancements should be on the table of priorities of any software program.
