There is a very interesting feature where you can change the setting of Photoshop. You can create a record and then edit the picture within a certain period to save time. The feature is very useful for a photographer who has an occasional desire to make a quick portrait of a model, then edits the picture later and put it in the family album. You can also create several versions of the picture with slightly different settings and then compare them later. An important feature for photographers is the texture tab where you can blend the textured surface. You don't have to worry about getting the right angle of light and observing the sun's movement on different surfaces. You only have to indicate the direction of clouds and other sheer textures in the dark. A calendar page is offered in which you can use the texture slider to blend in and create a hollow appearance. Masks can cover the areas of the image that you want to keep intact during editing. You can say that a pink dress on a blue background should be completely spared. You can even utilize an interesting tool to add varying degrees of transparency and contrast. You can also add color to the masks while removal of color from the edges also has a purpose. The next new feature on the horizon, which is still a year away at this time, is a major overhaul of the Stroke feature set, that is coming to Photoshop 2020. This will be a significant change to how you have previously used Photoshop to create high-quality strokes. The Brush is set up to work with the new feature but change basically everything about how you obtain strokes.
