More particularly, the present invention relates to an air inlet control panel. Gas turbine engines are known in the art and include a generally cylindrical rotor constructed to extract energy from a flow of combustion gases. The rotor may be referred to as a rotary assembly or rotary assembly. The rotor typically has a plurality of blades attached to it to pass the combustion gases around the engine and extract energy from the flowing gases. The rotor assembly typically rotates within an annular combustion chamber. The rotor blades pass through a flow of combustion air within the combustion chamber to direct the hot combustion gases into the rotational path of the rotor assembly. To accomplish this, the interior of the combustion chamber is closed and the rotor assembly is rotatably mounted within a stationary structure, which can include a casing, a vane assembly, and/or a ring. The combustion chamber is typically constructed in three segments or panels. The first panel is a forward panel and an
